PreSâ "In these books, playful rhymes answer the title question. Knees like these/don't grow on trees. Ten little lovelies/all in a row./ Whose toes are those?/ Do you know? On each spread, viewers get a glimpse of the youngster in question. On the final spread, the book takes a vertical twist to show the whole, laughing child. The stories are sweet and simple, and children will enjoy bending knees or wiggling toes along with the protagonists. The illustrations were sketched in graphite and painted digitally; they are warm and lively with swirls of color and friendly animals looking on. The text refers to knees so brown and so strong and toes so brown and sweet. These titles will add welcome diversity to board-book collections.â "Amelia Jenkins, Juneau Public Library, AK Copyright Â© Reed Business Information, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. in Saigon, Vietnam and grew up in Southern California. She attended the Art Center College of Design in Pasadena, CA where she earned a degree in Illustration. LeUyen worked as a layout artist for Dreamworks before illustrating children's books full-time. She has illustrated over a dozen books.

purchased this one for my one and only grandson who is almost one (8/9!!!!) I used to belong to a BOOK OF THE MONTH book club for children when our sons were little. I have not been able to find any book of the month clubs that really have very nice African American children books. I am very glad I did a search on and found this little gem! It is so cute and I love the fact that I my little man will enjoy this cute story and know that he is loved! It is important to me to see our children in every aspect of life via books and in positive light. This book is well made and the pictures along with the story (poetic format) is adorable.

Wonderful!!! So nice to see BROWN KNEES ON and IN a book!!!!

When I read a picture book to a child, I want the-child-in-the-book to be the same gender and color as the child I am reading to. I already had Jabari Asim's book, "Whose Toes Are Those?" which features a black, female child, whimsically illustrated by LeUyen Pham. I was hoping that Asim/Pham's book, "Whose Knees Are These?" would feature a black, male child -- and it does. I am happy to add "Whose Knees Are These?" to my library of picture books for young children.

I love reading this book to my brown son as I point to his brown knees.

love it

Very cute and helps to reinforce learning about body parts. The illustrations are lovely as well.

My daughter loves this book!

Love it!! Giving books as Christmas gifts to my nieces and nephews. It is important that our children, grow up, reading books with characters that looks like, and have hair, just as their own.
